IV.

PHILOSOPHY OF VENOUS CONGESTION.

SECTION I.—First observations upon phlebitis. — Venous congestion early regarded as an important condition of disease. — Opinions of authors as to the nature and causes of venous congestion. . . . .	216
SECTION II. — Armstrong's doctrines considered. — The lungs, in their relation to the doctrines of obstruction and remora. — Mechanical impediments to the venous circulation not a cause of disease. . . . .	230
SECTION III. — Supposed obstructions to the venous circulation farther considered. — Debility and relaxation of the veins. — Original case. . . . .	256
SECTION IV. — Inductions from the effects of remedies in venous congestion. . . . .	268
SECTION V. — Inductions from the causes of venous congestion. . . . .	276
SECTION VI. — Inductions from the symptoms. . . . .	281
SECTION VII. — Morbid anatomy of the veins. — What constitutes inflammation. — All tissues liable to this disease. — Hypothetical doctrines considered. . . . .	299
SECTION VIII. — Organization of the veins, &c. . . . .	331
SECTION IX. — Analogies supplied by varix, hypertrophy of the veins, &c. — The exciting and pathological causes of varix, and venous hypertrophy. — Morbid products of varix. — Analysis of a case of venous hypertrophy, from Cruveilhier. — The doctrine of spontaneous formations in the current of venous blood. . . . .	337

SECTION X. — The veins possess the power of dilating actively. . . . .	379
SECTION XI. — On the powers which circulate the blood. . . . .	398
SECTION XII. — Analogies resumed. — The doctrine of venous circulation applied to the philosophy of venous congestion. — The mechanical rationale of the operation of bloodletting, &c., in venous congestion. — Louis' cases of "the typhoid affection." — The complications of venous congestions with idiopathic fever. The modifying, and other influences of the former condition. — Pus. — Active phlebitis variously considered in its relations to venous congestion. — Products found in congested veins. — Typhus fever. — Humoral experiments. — Phlebitis and venous congestions, induced by irritating injections into the veins, manifest some of the phenomena of typhus fever. — Puerperal fever. — Puerperal, and endemic erysipelas. — Endemic at the New-York Alms-house. — Phlegmasia dolens constituted by venous or lymphatic inflammation. — Purpura hemorrhagica. — Scurvy. — Venous inflammation according to the nature of the remote causes. — Venous congestion as induced by narcotic poisons, carbonic acid gas, alcohol, &c. — Congestive asthma. — Modifications of venous inflammation farther considered. — The philosophy of the predisposing causes of disease. — Contagion. . . . .	427
SECTION XIII. — Condition of the various tissues of a congested organ. — Incipient seat of venous congestion. . . . .	514
SECTION XIV. — Venous congestion passes readily into inflammation of other tissues. — The rationale considered. . . . .	519
SECTION XV. — Active and passive inflammation and congestion. — No fundamental distinction. . . . .	524
SECTION XVI. — Philosophy of spontaneous hemorrhage, and its application to the pathology of venous congestion. . . . .	546

APPENDIX I.

Demonstration of the disease. . . . .	569
---------------------------------------	-----

APPENDIX II.

The importance of analogy and principles in medicine. . . . .	574
---	-----

APPENDIX III.

Cold, as a cause of venous congestion. . . . .	590
--	-----

APPENDIX IV.

Pathology of erysipelas. . . . .	603
----------------------------------	-----

APPENDIX V.

Pathology of tubercle and scrofula. . . . .	608
