The letters to the Editor of the AMERICAN MACHINIST, from which he has made so many extracts under the title of "Extracts from Chordal's Letters," were written with pleasure to the author. They were without any continued thought on any one subject, being intended as the presentation of the topic, rather than the thought.

With such intentions, it made little difference which side of a question was taken, or that an opposite side was taken in a succeeding letter.

There is but little need of consistency, where there is no tenacity of view.

A pleasure has also followed the writing of these letters. It has often come to the author's knowledge, that they were read by people who, as a rule, never read anything. It is not known that this proves merit in the letters, but there is a pleasure in knowing that one has in the smallest way, or in any way, been instrumental in getting anybody into the habit of reading anything.

There is plenty of shop in these letters; good shop and bad shop; in fact, they are shop letters, written for shop men, by a shop man, who has as much interest in the people who go into the shops, as in the marvelous products which come out of the shops.

As if there were not enough of the mechanic in these letters, it seems a pity to miss the chance, in a preface, to express the view that we live in a peculiar land, under a peculiar form of government, surrounded by peculiar social conditions.
