ANALYTICAL TABLE OF CONTENTS.

CHAPTER I.

CONDITION OF SCOTLAND TO THE END OF THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY.

|---|-------|
| Scotland and Spain are very dissimilar in regard to loyalty | 1 |
| But are very similar in regard to superstition | 4 |
| The Scotch unite liberality in politics with illiberality in religion. This is the largest and most important fact in their history; and the rest of the Volume will be occupied in investigating its causes. | 5 |
| Influence of physical geography | 5-7 |
| Roman invasion of Scotland | 7-9 |
| Irish invasion of Scotland | 9 |
| Norwegian invasion of Scotland | 11-12 |
| English invasion of Scotland | 12-17 |
| The injury which these invasions inflicted upon Scotland stopped the growth of towns, and thereby favoured the power of the nobles | 18 |
| The power of the nobles was still further favoured by the physical structure of the country | 19-20 |
| And by the weakness of the Crown | 20-21 |
| Hence their authority had, before the close of the fourteenth century, become enormous. The Crown, completely overshadowed by them, could derive no aid from the citizens, because, owing to the circumstances just mentioned, there were no cities | 21-23 |
| For, industry was impossible, and the commonest arts were unknown | 23-26 |
| Evidence of the scanty population of the Scotch towns | 26-30 |
| They were too feeble and insignificant to elect their own magistrates. | 32-33 |
| The municipal element being thus imperfect, the only ally, which the Crown could possibly find, was the Church | 34-35 |
| Hence, a coalition between the kings and the clergy against the nobles | 34 |
| The clergy were the only body who could withstand the nobles. Causes of the great influence of the clergy | 35-44 |
